Phoenician ceramics that were still used in the early Carthage era, the presence of Greek ceramics produced in the Athens area. These ceramics show the relations of the Punic world with Athens productions, with changing historical developments for two centuries. In ancient times via the Etruscans and later via a direct relationship between the Carthage world and the famous Greek city. In this phase, and the tomb is an important example of this, Athens area-produced ceramics from the Late Antique era with black figures (fig. 3) together with black slipware, again from Athens, were present from the end of the 6th to the early 5th century BC.
